Each vibe is shown as a full-bleed portfolio hero mockup — the first screen a casting director or collaborator sees. Palette, typography, and suitability are documented on each page. None of the vibes are mutually exclusive; elements can be blended.

On the architecture of a first impression.

A portfolio is not a résumé. It is a room that a casting director enters for ninety seconds. What they smell in the first ten is usually what they decide. The work below is built around a simple question: which room should the performer prepare?

Ten doors, ten weathers. Each has been drawn with the restraint of a rare-book designer and the devotion of a stage hand — margins weighed, typefaces cast, colors quoted in their full notation so a collaborator

The performer is not in these pages. Where a likeness would live, a quiet frame has been held for her, the way a rehearsal holds a mark. This is a map, not a mirror. A conversation starter, not a conclusion.

Only one of the rooms will feel like home. The purpose of the catalog is to find it.
